Quiet Revolution

I felt like Rip van Winkle Woken up from a deep long sleep And everything around had changed I felt that way when I visited chittoor campus yesterday after 6 months

As you enter the gates
There is a row of autos waiting in stand
To fill the lack of transport at the time of the lock down
The shamianas in front of the hospital
Transformed as patient waiting area and fever clinic

The SARI wards are running invisibly
NIV is the new entrant in technology
Pulmonary medicine doctor teaching everyone the basics of non invasive ventilation

The number of patients surgeries and deliveries have soared As medical facilities outside have closed

Sitting in the OPD

I felt the common people

Were coming for their antiepileptics and antihypertensives and multiple somatic complaints

This was a hospital of the ordinary people

This was a hospital that they can access at the time of the pandemic

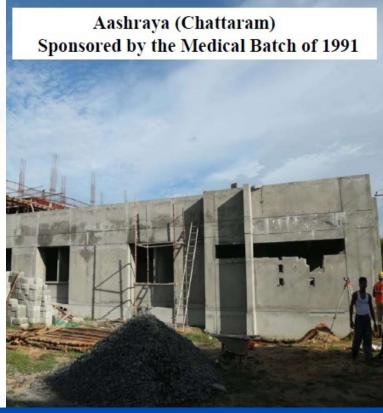

The new chatram is in the final finishing phase Waiting to house 30 patients families and attendants Will offer a facility for patient relatives to stay where there are currently none

The grand radiology suite With 16 slice CT scanner Two ultrasound machines Spankingly clean

The residential area is slowly expanding
The staff houses are full
The 300 room working women's hostel will be ready by the end of the year

The place is green after the rains
The water collections replenished
The trees vegetation birds and animal life are thriving

Talking to my guide, he told me that the most important changes in the last four years have been
The nursing college which can provide sustainable nursing, help establish education
The biodiversity areas and nature conservation
Lastly the clinical expansion

I felt traveling back That a quiet revolution was taking place Unseen and it was making a difference to many people
